Manager Commentary

Chinese equities soared over January. Mainland China indices hit five-month highs, amid growing optimism that the economy would rebound once the current COVID-19 exit wave has passed. Economic data for January was stronger-than-expected, despite high infection levels, with Chinese citizens welcoming the lifting of travel restrictions in time for the Lunar New Year celebrations. In less positive news, the Biden administration stopped issuing licences allowing US companies to export to Huawei, while Japan and the Netherlands agreed to restrict exports of chip manufacturing tools to China. China's economy grew 3.0% over 2022, missing the official target of "around 5.5% and marking the second slowest pace of growth since 1976 due to the country's strict zero-COVID policy. While the economy flatlined in the fourth quarter of 2022, data for January has shown a marked improvement following Beijing's decision to lift all COVID-19 restrictions. China's official composite purchasing managers index (PMI) surged to 52.9 in January, with activity in both the manufacturing and services sectors hitting a seven-month high. The official non-manufacturing PMI soared to 54.4 in January from 41.6 a month earlier, while the manufacturing PMI increased to 50.1 from 47.0 in December. The Chinese government vowed to make consumption the "main driving force" of the economy. In a statement, Li Keqiang, China's premier, said "boosting consumption is a key step to expand domestic demand. We need to restore the structural role of consumption in the economy". Beijing also announced several measures to support real estate demand, including a potential relaxation of the "three red lines" policy on leverage.
