Manager Commentary

Most of the Asian equities rebounded in the month of July as market begins taking a view that the global inflation could see its peak soon as shown through the recent drawdown in commodity prices and easing global supply chain tightness. The China related markets corrected in the month of July after posting strong gain in June amid concerns on signs of renewed crackdown on the tech sector to an escalation of the crisis engulfing property developers and a rebound in covid-19 cases in the country.

The US and EU markets rebounded in July despite continued monthly inflation surprise as recent pullback in the commodities as well as improvements in the global supply chain side resulted in investors taking a view that inflation may be peaking soon. During the Fed meeting in July, The Fed raised its FFR rate by 75 bps and mentioned that it will likely become appropriate to slow down the pace of increases while it assesses how the monetary tightening is affecting the economy and inflation. In Addition, the Fed also reassured the market that it does not think that the US economy is in recession, given the strong labor market. All these factors improved investors sentiment towards the global equity market in July.
