Manager Commentary

After a reprieve in March, the selloff resumed in April. All major asset classes declined in the month. US equities, convertible securities and high-yield bonds finished sharply lower. Pessimism rose in the period with investors facing rising interest rates, China lockdowns, and an ongoing war and debating whether the US economy and corporate earnings could withstand an aggressive tightening campaign to combat inflation. The expected pace of interest rate hikes in 2022 accelerated over the month with US Federal Reserve (Fed) Chairman Powell indicating that a half-percentage increase was "on the table" in May. Against this backdrop, US Treasury yields surged, and the curve (2s10s) steepened due to a sharper move at the longer end. Economic reports diverged with Q1 US gross domestic product (GDP) growth falling and inflation continuing to rise, while consumer sentiment rebounded, and weekly jobless claims remained low. Mixed financial results and guidance from a few high-profile companies overshadowed a better-than-expected start to the Q1 earnings season. Through April, 77% of S&P 500 companies topped earnings estimates with an upside surprise factor of +6.5%. Q1 and Q2 earnings revisions were also running above their respective historical trends.
